Mothers in the Movies — Part 3

TCM, beginning at 5pm

[CATCH A CLASSIC!]

Mother's Day may have been last week, but Turner Classic Movies is continuing its Sunday evening salutes to Mom tonight and next week with double features of films featuring memorable maternal figures. Up first in this evening's lineup is Pocketful of Miracles (1961), Frank Capra's Oscar-nominated remake of his 1933 film Lady for a Day, and the final feature he directed. The comedy follows a gangster (Glenn Ford) who repays a down-and-out street peddler (Bette Davis) for bringing him good luck by attempting to turn her into a sophisticated lady so that her daughter (Ann-Margret in her film debut), who believes her mother is a wealthy socialite, can marry her true love in style. The second film on tonight's twin bill is So Big (1953), director Robert Wise's drama based on the Edna Ferber novel. Jane Wyman stars as Selina, who, following her father's death and the loss of her fortune, becomes impoverished and takes a teaching job in a Dutch farming community. She marries a man named Pervus (Sterling Hayden) for security, and they have a son, Dirk (Steve Forrest, who won a Golden Globe for New Star of the Year). After Pervus dies, Selina struggles to steer Dirk's education, but he has other ideas.
